WHAT'S GOIN' ON?

Don't Try This At Home

By Erin Chalupa
This week, Ms. Hobbs' Physical Science class had a day of experimentation. They had five different groups that all tested many different things.

The first test was over Pascal's Law (pressure and volume). They had some fun making pop explode out of its can. The next group tested Boyle's Law (pressure and volume). They made marshmallows do some cool things by increasing and decreasing pressure. Some kids were caught eating the marshmallows instead of actually testing them. Another group tested Bernoulli's Law of velocity and pressure. They did some tricky things with blowing through funnels and tubes to see how high a ping-pong ball would go. Cole Stout got the award for the most air in the class. Next, a group tested Archimedes' principle of displacements of fluids. This group played around with water to see how much was displaced or overflowed. The last test was over Charles' Law of temperature and pressure. This group put Ivory soap in the microwave to see what happened.

This was a very successful day of learning for the freshmen class. The next day they had to clean up the huge mess they left from the day before; Ms. Hobbs was not very happy about that part!

Mallory Dances Her Way to the Stars

By Desi Hesselstine

Mallory began her dancing career at a young age. She began dancing at Studio E! in Keota when she was 4 years old. As time has gone by and Studio E! in Keota closed, Mallory moved her talent to Stairway to the Stars in Washington.

Mallory has a broad range of dance under her belt. She has been in ballet and jazz for 12 years, pointe ballet for 5 years, and tap and clog for 8 years. Mallory has also taken part in many group dances. These include trios, duets, small and large group entries, and just recently this year she took on a solo.

During her senior year at KHS, Mallory took on the role of being the head choreographer for the Keota Dance Team. She also hopes to join Iowa State's dance team in the fall. Way to go, Mallory, for your outstanding accomplishments in dance!

A Smile Worth Rewarding

By Emily Baetsle

On Sat. March 1, EagleRock! traveled to Central Lee to compete in show choir. Afterwards, they contacted Mrs. Edwards to inform her that Abby Schulte was named Outstanding Performer in their group that day!

When asked what she thought about the award, Abby said, "I was very shocked and surprised at the same time."

Congratulations Abby! Keep on smiling!
